

Madeline Lariscy
Interaction Foundations Meetings
November 9

Meeting with Greg!

I didn't record because I didn't see any instructions to record the meeting on the assignment details. If that was needed, I apologize!

- Greg said both of his mockups were fairly similar in design, which is something the teachers had discussed in class.
- We both agreed that MockUp A was better and more unifying in the desktop view, so that's the design direction he will go in.
- Greg wants to use the images to show what his concept is about, but it might be helpful to have clear headers since you can't just rely on the image with some text to be easy to read in terms of visual heirarchy.
- Maybe "The Story of Faker" is the website's main title and not just behind him in the main photo, and find a photo that conveys the topic and color scheme better (the yellow clashes with the color scheme, some photo with more red/black/white would work best)
- T1 logo isn't recognizeable enough to be the only link back to the homepage, and this website is not about T1 it's about Faker, but Faker doesn't really have a logo so we should just have a link of text that says that works better
- Add a footer to the bottom of the website, and design the rest of the mockup site since it's only partially designed
- Greg chose helvetica for body text, but maybe go to the T1 website and find out what font they used with the Inspect tool so it matches their brand
- Header font a little too thick and condensed, greg called it a mild concern and agreed, it's a little too chunky and looks less modern
- Dropdown menu on "career" implies it's all different pages, but Greg says they'll all be on the same page and whatever button you click it will scroll down to that part on the career page as a whole
- For the buttons in the navigational menu, when you hover over it, it will turn red to signify where you're going
- The mobile version could have a hamburger menu, because the move of navigation to the bottom of the page is confusing since it was at the top on the desktop view. Greg wants to add a hamburger menu to the top right and allow more space for the title.